Women in the Supply Chain Don Firth discusses women in the supply chain

The supply chain needs women and women could benefit from the many, interesting, well-paying jobs in the field. However, the number of women working in the field is lower than ever. To dig deeper into the current state of women in logistics, industry expert, Don Firth, CEO of JobsInLogistics.com, expands on his knowledge on the subject. Firth has over forty years' experience in the field, including positions as SVP Logistics for Pathmark Supermarkets, and Partner of the logistics consulting practice of Deloitte, among others.

You've had a long, successful career in business. Can you talk a bit about this history, and your view of women working in the supply chain, or in business in general?

The profitability of an entire company relies on the supply chain. It's a huge and often a neglected opportunity for companies.

As far as who chooses a career in the supply chain-it's not a profession like medicine or law. Not many women think, "I must be in logistics, or in the supply chain." It's not a career most women think of, and it's not a career men think of either. [...]
